A large hypertrophied left ventricle, without valvular disease to account for it, a hard pulse and characteristic sphygmographic tracing (see tig. 9), or an atheromatous condition of the arterial walls, are strongly suggestive of chronic kidney disease, more especially cirrhosis. 3. The exact diameter of the ophthalmoscopic changes. --In the great majority of cases of intracranial tumour, the retinal change is a papillitis, of greater or less severity; and in the great majority of cases of renal disease the changes in the fundus oculi are those described under the term albuminuric retinitis. (See tig. 10). But in some cases of tumour the retinal changes resemble, more or less closely, those of Blights disease, white spots or streaks being present in the neighbourhood of the macula; and vice versa, in some cases of Blights disease, the white patches are absent and the retinal change...
